That assertion of Pope's.

A little learning is a dangerous thing, applies perhaps with more especial force to the profession of medicine. How many lives have been sacrificed through the incompetence of some doctors even in European countries? The tale of those lost to China linga's daughter, and that his future prosperity prisoner Chea Tam-yin had been daily declared through ignorance is simply endless.

The benefits that will attend the introduction of Western Medical science into the Central Kingdom are such as the Chinese people cannot yet realise; the amount of suffering doctors trained on the Western system could relieve in China it would be impossible to even estimate. The boon would be priceless. The barriers of prejudice have to be surmonoted and the opposition of the native doctors still remains to be overcome, but these obstacles will not prove insuperable. Many high officials, including His Excellency the Viceroy of Chible, have become convinced of the superiority of Western medicine to the crude and unscientific system followed in the Central Kingdom. and in some degree the way has been prepared by the eplendid work done by the made signally apparent to even the Chinese

AN INTERNATIONAL REGIMENT.

from the Swede and the Russian to the dark African, the proportion in which the different European nations are represented being as follows :- About one-fifth are from Alsaco and Lorraine, two-fifths are German and Dutchmen, one-fifth Belgians and Swiss, and the rest are from other countries. It is but natural that every possible element and character should be found among these men, and the different types of human beings are perhaps nowhere in the whole world brought so closely together as they are in this place, where the lowest criminal and the man of highest education and oulture live side by side. The foreigners' room at the barracks is an interesting place. It is a large compartment, extremely clean and tidy, and containing twentyeight bads, over each of which hangs the soldier's leather belt, his second pair of hoots, his knapsack, do., while his clothes lie carefully folded on a shelf higher up. The gans, all well cleaned and greased stand on gun racks on either side of the enfrance The soldiers are nearly all in the room, as the weather has been wet. There is a group of four young Garmans gambling at one of the tables. Next to them two men are playing chess, the board being represented by a piece of paper and the figures by little pieces of carved wood. Further away there is another group of Swiss volunteers, evidently all belonging to the honest working classes, except one, whose restless eyes are osseolessly flying about, and who has enlisted after doing away with a considerable sum of his employer's money. In another corner of the room a number of soldiers are sitting close together, listening to a grey-headed man who has boon in service for more than twenty five years, and who is decorated with a whole row of medals. While he is chowing his tobacco, he tells for the hundredth time of his campaigns in Mexico, in the Crimes, in Italy, and in the war of 1870-71 The lads and listening with deep interest to the words of the veteran, whose adventures become the more stirring and terrible the longer he tells of them. Next to this group a short, stout fellow, with red hair and a red, swollen face, is lying on the bed, his pipe in his mouth, idly staring about. He is a Belgian who deserted from the army at the age of twenty-one, has been in India for six years, and after that joined the Russia will at no very distant date be in direct foreigners' regiment.
